Preserving Poux .- The season is at hand when many persons will be called on to sait their pork, and some of them will be at a loss to how to do it. An article is going through the papers, suggesting that the right way is to "put twenty-five pounds of sult to the barrel; then make a brine and put it on cold. After it has pickled through, uld, skim the brine and turn at on hot, as it has settled, and scald as often as it is clear as mud, and enough to distract any one who has a barrel of pork at stake. Nothing is more simple us to walt a burrel of pork so that it will keep forever, for aught we know, if you don't eat it. In the first pince, have a good hog, dress him in a cool time, and let him long until the whole carenes is cooled throughout. Cut out the fat pork neatly, taking away every piece that is bloody, or wash out the blood clean with cold water. The strips should be three or four inches wide. Lay them in a cool place, each piece by itself, for twenty-four ours, then sprinkle the bottom of a perfectly sweet barrel, half an inco thick, with what is called "coarse-food" salt, and on that lay the strips of pork, with the skin next the barrel, and so continue until the bottom is entirely covered. Pack it closely. Then cover that layer with balf an inch of salt, and so continue until the barrel is full; gases." cover the top with salt, and then lay a clean strip of board over it, and on that a stone sufficiently beavy to keep the whole from rising. Let it stand twelve hours, and then fill the barrel with clean cold water. We have practiced this method for twenty years and have not lost a pound of pork. It s " as sweet as a nut," and gives an excelent relish to many kinds of food in cooking that nothing che with. It lean pieces are ucsired they should be most carefully washed before being salted. In taking the pork ed to float above the brice, as it will be like-ly to ruin the whole. If the weather is a be well to take it out in April, wash the turn it and add new salt as the pork is laid
